We have been turrible hard

When we was in most desperate straights, Cy Hoskins dropped into the office and happened to make a remark that "Honesty is the best policy." Cy said this with reference to something we was conversing about, a subjeck which we now forgit. That suggested a subjeck for a editorial, viz., "Is Honesty the Best Policy?"

We have our doubts whether it is or not, and we are not afeared to come right out flat-footed and subject of the come right out of the same house with the can't said edef as a post, which everybody in Bingville knows, being as a post, which everybody in Bingville knows, being as a post, which everybody in Bingville knows, being as a post, which everybody in Bingville knows, being as post, who are a post, what she called a "Amerry Widder Hat." we ask, and we pause for a reply. Homesty might be the best policy perviding everybody was honest, but where about nine-tenths of the population of Bingville is liars and thieves, honesty don't seem to be much of a success. We have run the Bugle for the last 30 odd years on the theory that honesty is the best policy, and what have we got to show for it, pray, except a big subscripshion list of dead-beat subscribers, and so many obligations staring us in the face that we are only living from hand to

"Maybe you left it in your pocket," says Ranse. When Seth found the star in his pocket he looked kind of foolish and ment off home without course on the dirt floor to prevent would expect him to say anything else ville you have to be a rascal. Anyish and went off home without saying a person stepping into pools of water, about the town he lives in even if he that the Bingville Bugle has nine regpray for deliverence, and when he got out of patience praying he would go back to cussing again, but what was the use?
